HISTORY OF AROMATHERAPY

For centuries, cultures around the world have used essential oils from flowers and plants as ointments, incense, perfumes, cosmetics and for medicinal and culinary applications. Today aromatherapy has become quite sophisticated in its practice and is seen as a natural alternative therapy used to enhance overall health and well-being. The benefits obtained from aromatherapy depend upon the quality of the essential oils used. These essential oils, extracted from various parts of plants and flowers, have a remarkable ability to relax, stimulate and influence our overall mood.

THE POWER OF SMELL

Few things can move us so deeply or have so profound an impact as specific smells and fragrances. Smell actually has more impact on the subconscious and emotions than the other senses, and there is little doubt that scents have important roles in human behavior. Our sense of smell is tied directly and intimately to the part of our brain most involved with memory and emotion, called the limbic system. Our reactions to an odor largely depend on our experience with it, and what our brain remembers. Essential oils are powerful forces of nature.

With their aromatic properties, these natural oils have a remarkable ability to help lift our spirits, relax us, stimulate us and influence our overall mood.
